It is easy to despise what you cannot get.

-----Aesops Fables

(The Fox and the Grapes) A bad nighttime storm near Philadelphia, the next day leaves black ice and sun glare. The Pennsylvania Turnpike is the scene of a huge accident involving close to a hundred cars. The traffic is backed up for over ten miles and no one moves for eight hours. Rookie cop, Harris Montag is sent to help with crowd control. There are a few minor scuffles, but Harris is feeling pretty good about his keeping order until he finds three cars with a person shot to death in each. No one has heard or seen anything, and when Harris investigates further he finds that the three people do not seem to know each other, or be connected at all. So begins a labyrinth of deception and betrayal. Harris loyalty to his job and the people close to him is tested. It seems like a maniac has done the crime, and possibly this is true, but we dont know who exactly lives next door to us. Is it better to not trust anyone? John Osipowicz was born in Madison, Wisconsin, and graduated (cum laude) from the University of Notre Dame. After college he worked in advertising for the Chicago Tribune, but then migrated into teaching mainly in the suburbs of Philadelphia. Currently he lives across from a horse farm, thirty miles west of Philly. He has a dog who died last year but still lives in his heart, and a cat so fat its been mistaken for a raccoon. His hobbies are whimsy and leisure. The key to writing, he feels, is the ability to construct the next sentence. Since retiring from teaching, hes had the leisure to indulge his whimsy by writing murder mysteries. He attests to the fact that none of the victims in his stories were former difficult students.
