Not illustrated. 1832 Excerpt: ...The purple amethyst there had place, And the hues of a full-blown rose. And the vivid green, as the sun-lit grass Where the pleasant rain hath been; And the ideal hues, that, thought-like, pass Through the minds of fanciful men; They beamed full clear--and that form moved on, Like one from a burning-grave; And we dared not think it a real thing, But for the rustling wave. The sun just lingered in our view, From the burning edge of ocean, When by our bark that bright one passed With a deep, disturbing motion: The far down waters shrank away, With a gurgling rush upheaving, And the lifted waves grew pale and sad, Their mothers bosom leaving. Vet, as it passed our bending stern, In its throne-like glory going, It crushed on a hidden rock, and turned Like an empires overthrowing. The uptorn waves rolled hoar,--and huge, The far-thrown undulations Swelled out in the suns last, lingenng smile, And fell like battling nations. One glorious orb by day we hail, By night one faithful ray. Thus God his undivided light Pours on lifes troubled wave; Thus hope, meek star, through deaths still night, Looks on the Christians grave. Monarch of heaven, Eternal One, On thee our spirit calls; To thee, as followers of thy Son, We consecrate these walls. These arches, springing to the sky, This lightly swelling dome, That lifts to heaven its starry eye,--Be these, O God, thy home. And wilt thou, Omnipresent, deign Within these walls to dwell?--Then shalt thou hear our holiest strain, Our organs proudest swell. Devotions eye shall drink the light That richly gushes through Our simple dome of spotless white, From thine, of cloudless blue. And Faith, and Penitence, and Love, And Gratitude, shall bend To thee:--O hear them from above, Our Father and our Friend. The Bride.--An...
